encarta 2005 free download NASA's Mars rover Curiosity is nearly half-way to its first major target on the Red Planet - Mount Sharp - on the edge of a vast crater. The rover has already taken many high-resolution images of the mountain, which are among the best ever taken of a mountain on Mars. At the base of Mount Sharp is a large, crater-like feature known as the Murray formation. This feature holds information about the ancient climate and environment of Mars' lower reaches, and of the Red Planet in general. "The new science observations we're taking with Curiosity's Mars Hand Lens Imager on the rover's arm will help us understand how the Murray formation formed," said Jim Green, NASA's chief scientist for planetary science. The new rover images of Mount Sharp give clues about how the Murray formation was formed. Images from the 1-million-pixel Mars Hand Lens Imager (MAHLI), which was mounted on Curiosity's arm, showed a difference between the crater walls and the Murray formation. These wall and mountain images also provide information about the relationship between the mountain and its surroundings.

"These new images offer us a chance to look at Mount Sharp from a new perspective, and they should help answer a big question for Mars geologists," said John Grotzinger, rover project scientist, based at the California Institute of Technology in Pasadena, Calif. "We're using MAHLI to help us sort out the nature and history of this part of Mount Sharp." The mission of NASA's Jet Propulsion Laboratory, Pasadena, California, is to explore distant worlds and unravel the secrets of the cosmos, from solid planets to quasars, from complex atoms to potent signs of life in our own solar system. The agency achieves this deep space mission work through an advanced engineering and science development program involving thousands of team members from across the United States and around the world.
