system is commonly implemented as a symmetric multiprocessor (SMP) system. Such a system is made up of multiple processors coupled to a shared bus and memory. The processors have equal access to the shared bus and memory. Each processor in the computer system has a corresponding processor control register (P-CTR) which is typically maintained in a memory that is accessible by the processors. The P-CTR controls the operation of the processor. Typically, the P-CTR comprises a cyclic redundancy check (CRC) bit. The P-CTR includes a command field. The command field includes a command which is interpreted by the processor. When the processor detects a command in its P-CTR, the command is interpreted to execute an instruction. However, the interpretation of the command

depends on the contents of the CRC of the P-CTR. Typically, the P-CTR stores only one or two commands. For example, the command field of the P-CTR may be used to designate a single command, such as to send a message to a remote system or to return a message to a remote system. Such a single command is known as a long message command. In such a case, an SMP system must set its P-CTR to reflect one of two commands. In one instance, the CRC of the P-CTR is set to reflect the long message command. The long message command causes the processor to translate the command into a corresponding machine instruction and execute the instruction in the memory. In another instance, the P-CTR stores a short message command. In another example, a long message is received by the processor. The CRC of the P-CTR is stored as the command. If the CRC of the P-CTR is non-zero, then a second command is stored for a CRC test. Upon completion of the CRC test, if the CRC of the P-CTR is zero, then the processor interprets the second command. This second command instructs the processor to translate the command into a corresponding machine instruction and execute the instruction in the memory. A problem with 3ef4e8ef8d
