It's not perfect but i think the way this is done in final version is noticeably more natural for jon. Please don't compare two different live shows, they are different. this live show was done a week ago, fresh. first step was to get everything as it should be after the routine. the next step is to wait and see if the routine will flow naturally with these snares. If not, i will fine tune it more, maybe even start from scratch and try different rhythm patterns for . It will be a challenge but . The main part of this live show is the main theme, with the final snares, the BPM jump. You may download the whole show here. Please write something in your comments if you like this version and i will add it to the post. A: For many years there was no need to take live audio and sample it. If you needed a live audio sample you could burn it to a CD and give it to your collaborator. There was no need to capture it and then do stuff to it to produce something that you could then use on a computer. The real advantage of live audio is that the artist is playing music with their hands and their bodies. Doing something with live audio and then getting the results from it in a computer is only a partial representation of what the artist is doing. Most of what they are doing is happening with their bodies, not with a computer. Any musician will tell you that they get something different from playing in a real studio than from playing in a computer. Sampling is good if you are producing music for the same genre as the person who you sampled from. If they play metal and you are producing a pop track then you may get a result that is too poppy for the metal band you sampled from. The other advantage of sampling is that it allows you to change the sound of the whole track without changing any of the samples. For example if you take a sample of an electric guitar that has a punchy sound then you can add reverb to the track without changing the sound of the sampled guitar.
