The challenges faced by African farmers and their livestock are many and varied, and few are adequately addressed by livestock production alone. The private sector is often prevented from working on a broader holistic approach to livestock management that takes into consideration broader environmental, animal welfare and climate challenges. However, not doing so could be making cattle more vulnerable to parasites and diseases as the risk of losing a calf or treating a sick animal is worsened by poor livestock management. Furthermore, the benefits to farmers of improved livestock production are not restricted to a linear production of animals. This could include a sustainable herd structure that improves the nutritional, economic and social well-being of farmers and their families. 2015!
