GPS Track Viewer is a utility that lets you easily and quickly analyze navigation paths and routes. The application is available in a small standalone package for free download, and only works with the standard format for location data (TCX/GPX) and presents it in a simple world map. It can also display a path on a previously saved map, as well as analyze and display specific coordinates and values that might be interesting. For a small size, it's a pretty useful tool and easy to use, and it makes navigation easy to do. The interface may be a little bit bland but there's enough going on under the hood to ensure that it's very useful. For example, there's a map view which will display all points recorded in one place, and there's also a panel that's used to store paths, points, distances and other details. The idea is very simple. The application works by analyzing the locations in your path. All information is then put in the form of an interactive graph, with the ability to view points, values and how much they differ from the previous position. The result is that you can easily see how much time you spend at a particular spot, and the distance traveled, as well as the average speed. It may not have the most versatile feature set, but GPS Track Viewer does a good job at getting it to where it needs to be and providing all the information that you might be after.
