The effect of foot and head movements on postural stability was investigated in healthy young males and females, as well as individuals with a history of ankle sprains. Subjects' posture was controlled by a computer-assisted robotic device (REVA). Surface electromyography (EMG) was used to control the dynamics of the orthosis. EMG signals from ankle, knee and hip joints were utilized to control the joint angle trajectories. The subjects were asked to stand as upright as possible on a force platform while the ankle and knee joints were moved systematically. The effects of the three types of movement (ankle, knee, and hip) were quantitatively investigated by using ellipse, perturbation matrix, and sway area. The changes in the postural stability and EMG activity during the postural adaptation were compared in healthy young males and females and in males with ankle sprains. Postural stability was increased with the range of ankle joint movements, and static reflexive activity was increased with knee joint movements. The results indicate that ankle joint movement assists postural stability by increasing the contractile activity of ankle and knee extensors. Every now and then, someone will ask me why the site is called "After the Show" rather than "After the Fringe." I remind them that we're in America and to pronounce the word with two Rs. It's not that simple, though. As those who have seen a play can attest, what happens after a show ends is quite a different affair than what goes on in the theater during a play's run.
