Apoptosis, but Not Necrosis, Extends the Thermal Sensitivity of

Transformed Cells. A number of reports have shown that various cells are not killed or survive when exposed to heat with a particular temperature gradient. Cells respond differently to continuous heat exposure as compared with a given temperature pulse. The underlying mechanisms behind this differential heat response are not clear. To elucidate this issue, we compared the levels of cell death, at various time intervals, induced by 45 min of constant heat exposure at 42.5°C with those induced by 15 min of 42.5°C pulses followed by 55 min at 37°C. Our results revealed that a 15 min exposure at 42.5°C followed by a 55 min recovery at 37°
