Q: Passing OCaml types to C I am working on a project where I need to use some C/C++ code, I've looked into ocamlobjc, but it appears that this is not possible since C functions can't accept an ocaml type, so what are my options? Is it possible to build a function with an entry that takes either an ocaml type or a C struct? EDIT: After looking around a bit, I discovered that ocamlobjc can be used to call some C functions using a ocaml struct, but not other functions. Is it possible to get around this? A: I would suggest ocamlobjc-c. If you look into its documentation, it has example of calling C functions through Objective-C interface. The only problem that can appear is that ocamlobjc-c is not very stable and can have certain bugs (like the one that they can't call C functions through ocaml-style parameters). You can try to use ocamlobjc-c-custom (also they have examples in their documentation) but it's more like hack than something useful.

But it seems like the time has come, and we will have the first glimpse of what the Jobs-led company is cooking in the tech world, as they are rumored to be launching a social networking website called Twitter-like microblogging service. According to recent reports, the company has reportedly been developing the new service as a social networking microblogging site called Twitter. According to the report, a few leaked screenshots of the upcoming Twitter-like service have already hit the Web, as the new Twitter will only allow users to share 140 characters long messages. The new Twitter will be similar to current Twitter client TweetDeck, which will allow users to post 140 characters long messages to Twitter and also import content from other services, such as Facebook, MySpace and Digg. According to the report, the new microblogging service will also feature a user profile page with details such as username, date of birth, and last seen on the service. The new Twitter will also allow users to have accounts or log in with their Facebook IDs, in addition to working with phone numbers, email addresses and contacts. However, there's no word yet when the new service will be launched, but it has been speculated that the new service will be released at Apple's iPad 2 event which is scheduled for Tuesday, Jan. 27.Q: How to disable spell check while writing a letter?
